THE CLOSING YEAR.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.
BY E. M. ELSOM.

My heavenly muse, awake, lift up thine eyes!
And in deep thought, let all thy powers arise!
Come, sing the close of time, with solemn sound,
When months, when years, no more shall roll around,
And all the sons of Adam's race must die
And meet a vast, a long, Eternity.

Important hour! oh, great tremendous day!
When yonder vast expanse shall melt away,
The rolling sun in darkness hides his rays
Or flees before the Godhead's awful blaze;
While flaming fire is through the imperial hurled
And spreading round, consumes the spacious world.

And then, my soul, must meet the Eternal God,
Enjoy his smiles, or sink beneath his rod:
Nor raise thy voice with joy as then didst here,
To sing the close of time, a New-born Year.
The seasons, now no more shall move around,
Or man enjoy the fruits of earthly ground,
But all are changed for an eternal scene,
And roll along without a change between!

Come, then my soul arise, and bless thy God
Who spared thy life so long, withheld his rod,
And opened his exhaustless fountains wide
While their rich streams have rolled on either side,—
Adore him for the blessing of the past,
And spend this year, as if it were thy last.

Draw in the breath he gives, and eye his ways,
Then breathe it back in gratitude and praise.
As steady, as the hours and moments fly,
Be thou concerned to live, and learn to die.
That the approach of time may fire thy song
And furnish matter to employ thy tongue.

MARRIED IN A JEST; OR, The Table Turned on a Practical JOKER.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.
BY J. AUSTIN SPERRY.

"Delilah Moore! Delilah Moore! you'll be caught in your own trap some day. Oh, you'll change your tune, I'll warrant. You'll play a joke some of these times, that will be a sorry joke for you and old as I am, I'll live to see it, too."

But little did Delilah heed the warning shake of the finger or the awfully prophetic words of Aunt Marcia, as she danced around the room, in an ecstacy of fun, holding her graceful sides, and filling the house with the merry music of her laughter. And what think you, was the occasion of her extravagant mirth? Why she had caught her Aunt Marcia composedly dozing in her rocking chair, and no doubt whether a drowning man ever caught more eagerly at a straw, than did the mercurial girl at one which lay, suggestive of sly mischief, upon the floor. Moving on tip-toe to the back of the old lady's chair, she extended the straw, and tickled her aged cheek the least bit in the world. Aunt Marcia gave her head a smart shake, as if to dislodge a saucy fly, and Delilah compressed her pretty red lips, to restrain her merriment. The ships was again applied, and the old lady raised her hand quickly, but without opening her eyes, to brush away the annoyance. A third time was the provoking titillation repeated, when Aunt Marcia, though not a passionate woman, began to lose patience at the pertinacity of the supposed insect in disturbing her repose, and, in mere self-defence, resolved upon its destruction. Accordingly she raised her hand cautiously to within some six or eight inches of her face, and then brought it suddenly down with such force as to leave the red marks of her fingers there, and cause her cheek to tingle with the pain. Delilah could contain herself no longer, but fairly screamed with delight, while her Aunt, thus made aware of the source of the annoyance, with ominous gravity delivered the speech above quoted.

Lively as a cricket, and quite as noisy, was Delilah Moore. She was very pretty, too—indeed, bewitching. Auburn hair that floated in ringlets of gossamer lightness about the softest and fairest of cheeks—light blue eyes, a light step, and a lighter heart, and rosy lips, that smiled incessantly, even in sleep—ah! what a little lump of mischievous sweetness she was! But she was most incorrigibly addicted to practical joking. I dare say there was not an individual in the village, who had not at some time or other been a victim of this propensity of her's, and yet nobody could ever seriously be angry with her. Every one chided her, yet every one loved her. Very nervous people were afraid of her; but fond of her too; and by such she was treated something after the fashion in which children treat a playful pet kitten,—fondled and careful, but always with due respect to her claws.

Many a village youth addressed her, but she proved a will o' the wisp to her wooers. She was never serious long enough to hear a proposal, so that most of them soon wearied in the butterfly-chase she led them. But even a butterfly is caught sometimes, and it is not to be supposed that Delilah could rove forever free. Her mother often said that just in proportion as she teased, annoyed, and ridiculed particular persons, she would be caught by some one who had the power to make her feel the force of her own ridicule. Her mother had her own ideas, too, as to who that person should be, and was not unfriendly to the suit of young Walter Lake, who was the son of one of the most wealthy and respectable farmers in the county, and was steadily pursuing the profession of law, in the village. He was one of her earliest admirers, and had persevered in his addresses, when his more faint-hearted rivals gave up the seemingly vain pursuit, and yet, even with a clear field, his endeavors to "bring her to the mark," seemed hopeless, and he too was beginning to despair when a little accident, with a little ruse, betrayed the little castle of her heart, which he had been so long besieging, into his hands. He was walking in the garden with her one evening striving desperately to bring about a little bit of serious conversation, which she, with equal perseverance, evaded, by bursts of merriment and strokes of ridicule, when one of her frisky movements brought her foot into collision with a large beam, which, standing upright, received very precarious support from the bough of a tree which overhung the walk. It tippled over, and Walter, in the effort to shield her, caught the whole weight of the blow upon his right arm. It occasioned but a slight bruise; but perceiving the alarm which Delilah's features instantly exhibited, he turned the affair to good account by affecting to be seriously hurt. Of all people, those of a sanguine temperament have the quickest sympathies, and are the least able to control their emotions, whether of pleasure or pain. Delilah for once became as grave and serious as a judge, while her blue eyes swam with tears of unaffected distress. Walter did not neglect the favorable moment to draw her almost unconsciously into an exposition of her real sentiments towards himself, and such a sweet and unreserved confession of love rewarded the stratagem, as made him inwardly bless the carelessness which had elevated the old timber-stick to its neck-breaking attitude. Delilah was fairly beaten at her own weapons. Almost ere she had time to think, she had exchanged vows and plighted her faith irrevocably. In the movements of delicious embarrassment which succeeded, the accident that had had brought the tender scene about, was quite forgotten, and when she did recall the accident to mind, she was surprised to find that her lover's injured arm had for the last five minutes been circling her little waist with an affectionate vigor that was perfectly unnatural to a fractured limb.

"Oh, you vile fellow!" she exclaimed, breaking suddenly away from him, with a return to her accustomed levity, "it wasn't fair—it's too bad to be cheated so, but won't I pay you for this the next time I catch you—trust me for that!"—and half piqued at the ruse, yet wholly delighted with its result, she tripped away to the house, leaving him alone among the flowers to reflect upon the happy adventure.

It might be supposed that now Delilah was engaged, the prospect of some day assuming the responsibilities of a wife would make her more staid,—more sedate and dignified. But not so, she was wilder and more mischievous than ever. Just in proportion as her happiness was increased her propensity for practical joking was increased also. The very next evening, she succeeded in retaliating upon her lover the cheat he had practised. Some friends were passing the evening with her, and a merry party she made it, with her fun and frolic. When it was nearly time for her company to withdraw, a little dispute arose between her and Walter, as to the precise hour.

"It is near eleven o'clock," said he.

"No," she returned, "scarce ten."

"What will you bet?" asked he, playfully.

"A Quaker lip," was her ready reply.

"Done! Done!"

The bargain was scarcely thus closed, when the silvery tones of the old clock in the hall tolled ten.

"There, I've won!" exclaimed Delilah.

"Fairly won," answered Walter, but without manifesting any disposition to liquidate the debt.

"Well!" cried his little sweetheart, in a tone of sly inquiry, "ain't you going to pay up?"

Walter was staggered. However happy he might have been to pay the Quaker lip, (a coin with which the reader is doubtless familiar,) at a more fitting and private opportunity, he was mortified at her seeming want of modesty in demanding it in presence of so many witnesses—notwithstanding that the light had been sent out of the room a moment previous.

"Why, how can I find you in the dark?" he stammered.

"A pretty excuse, indeed! Here I am, behind the table, ready to meet you half way over it, and if it's dark, so much the better—I need be at no pains to hide my blushes."

While the company were electrified at this unlooked for forwardness, Walter's gallantry unable to withstand a second appeal, urged him reluctantly to the table, where a loud and unequivocal buss, testified that the forfeit was duly and fully paid.

"Being a light!—bring a light, Ellen Smith!" cried Delilah, almost choking with laughter. The young lady addressed, anticipating sport of some kind, was not slow to comply, and upon her appearance with the light, there stood the fun-loving girl, her fair fingers clenching tightly the great ears of her woolly-headed negro maid, whose ebony features were thus held forward across the table in the precise spot Walter had approached to pay the lost lip. Two rows of grinning ivories betrayed the delight with which Molly participated in the jest. Of course, the confused lover was greeted with convulsions of laughter, which he, with a lame grace, was forced to join in, while, at the same time, he made an instinctive manifestation of disgust, by applying his handkerchief to his mouth. The cream of the joke, however, Delilah alone enjoyed. While she had determined to turn the laugh upon Walter, she had no notion of being defrauded of her dues—but had in reality received the kiss herself.

Months passed on, and Delilah continued the same provoking, pretty, bewitching, mischievous little madcap as ever, with the exception that her jokes were not altogether as harmless as formerly, but became more seriously annoying in their character. To be sure she never occasioned pain to others, that she did not bitterly lament it, and sorrow over her inconsiderateness with a penitence that was truly sincere—while it lasted. But the rebound of her feelings was always in proportion to the grief which at the moment oppressed them, and she was no sooner done mourning for the consequences of one excess than she was guilty of a greater. Her mother scolded, her father threatened, and her lover entreated, but all alike ineffectually. The latter, indeed, sometimes thought seriously of giving her up entirely, for his judgment whispered him that it would be impossible to live in harmony with such a mixture of mischief and caprice, yet some how his heart in the other scale always kicked the beam against his reason, and he could not master resolution to forsake her. Apart from her unfortunate peculiarity, she possessed every charm that was desirable in a woman, and Walter preached himself into lethargy, and lived along in the hope she would some day see the impropriety of her conduct, and settle down finally to love, honor and obey, in sober earnestness, as a sensible woman should.

In the meanwhile the various members of Delilah's family, who were kept in a continual ferment by her eccentricities, held an indignation meeting, at which, after due deliberation, it was resolved that she must be cured, and her worthy uncle, the Doctor, entrusted with the case.

"So, uncle, you've undertaken to cure my—what d'ye call the affection?—oh, I have it!—morbid propensity for practical joking," exclaimed Delilah, as she tripped into his office the day after the holding of the family council.

"Kill or cure, you jade—that's my maxim," returned the Doctor tartly, without taking his eyes from the paper upon which he was inditing a prescription.

"La! what a dear barbarous old uncle you are! But I hope you will adopt the homœopathic treatment in my case."

"Homœopathy be hanged!" The Doctor was intolerant of all innovations.

"I am quite taken with homœopathy of late, continued Delilah. "I believe in the doctrine that like cures like, and I won't be treated by any other system."

"Suppose we compromise it, sauce box," said the Doctor, peering over his spectacles with a twinkle of his small round eyes that meant more than he chose to utter; "suppose we compromise it, and say a homœopathic remedy in alopathic proportions."

"Good! good!" exclaimed his merry niece. "I'll be your patient forever!"

The doctor shook his head menacingly, and left his seat to rummage his bookshelves for a volume which he just then had occasion for. Delilah, so soon as his back was turned, slipped into his chair, unfolded the prescription he had just written, and found it to read thus—

Rx.—Argent. nitr. gr. x.
Aquæ dist. ℥ss—M.

With a sculpel which lay upon the table, the incorrigible girl dexterously erased some of the letters, and then with the pen interpolating others—a task which the doctor's sprawling and discourteous chirography rendered quite easy—soon altered the reading to the following form—

Rx.—A gust, in bad gloves.

Agreeably disposed. Marry immediately.

When the doctor resumed his seat, the altered prescription was carefully refolded and returned to its place—while Delilah, in another chair was buried in the perusal of the last Gazette. A few minutes afterwards, a servant made his appearance, and the prescription was placed in his hands, with directions to deliver it to Miss Olivia Afterprime. Miss Olivia, by the way, was a young maiden with a year or two on the far side of fifty, and of excessively tender sensibilities.

The door had scarce closed after the servant, ere Delilah's pent up laughter burst forth. The doctor started as if he had received an electric shock. Knowing that those merry sounds portended mischief, his first impulse was to carry his hand to his head to make sure that his wig was there; his next, to examine the skirts of his coat, to see that no quizzical label was pinned to them. Finding his person exempt from the trick, whatever it might be, he turned to his niece with as much austerity as he could assume—for it was almost impossible to resist the contagion of her merriment—and said, approaching her with a demonstration of resolute—

"Get you gone, graceless! You've been at some of your mischief again!"

Delilah, in unrestrained glee, scampered from the office into the house, which was adjoining, and was soon engaged in poking new fun at her aunt. The doctor, in the meanwhile, commenced a diligent search of the office for the cause of her amusement. While he was thus engaged, his servant returned with the altered prescription, which solved the mystery. Miss Olivia Afterprime had nigh gone into convulsions at sight of it, and in towering indignation, had sent immediately to employ another physician. Whether the doctor was greatly grieved at the loss of his patient, does not appear—but certain it is, that he inwardly vowed vengeance upon Delilah. Putting his hat over his eyes, and burying his hands deep in his pockets, he hurried forth to agitate a plot retributive.

When the doctor returned to dinner, and found his niece at the table—there was a complacency in his air, and a sort of anticipated triumph in the twinkle of his eye, which seemed to say—"ah! infidel, I have thee!" No other allusion, direct or indirect was made to the jest of the morning—if we except a sly smile that lurked in the corners of Delilah's mouth, as she occasionally suspended her knife and fork to glance roguishly into her uncle's face. Dinner concluded, she ran up stairs to get her bonnet to go home. She lingered a few minutes at the toilet to arrange her curls. This done she turned to leave the chamber, but found it was "no go"—for the door had been quietly closed, and the key turned upon the outside.

"Aha!" said she to herself, "I'm to be kept prisoner here till teatime, as a punishment for my trick. Ha! ha! what a retaliation! His conscience 'hath this extent—no more!' Bless his silly good natured pate!"

Quite contented with her durance, she picked up a book, and seated herself by the open window. Her eyes soon wandered from its pages, however, and her attention was caught by "metal more attractive" without. In the piazza, at the rear of the hotel—which was just opposite, and divided from the doctor's residence only by the small yard attached to either building—stood a stranger, who was leaning forward in an attitude of intense admiration, gazing at Delilah through his eye-glass. He was dressed in the top of the mode—With long black hair, most fastidiously combed and curled; whiskers of a length and luxuriousness that would have done no discredit to a Moslem; a moustache of elegant proportions, and, what contributed to make his appearance eminently ridiculous, his eye-glass was applied over a pair of green spectacles. Altogether, his air and manner was so decidedly Frenchified, that there was no mistaking his nationality.

Delilah ever on the alert for making sport, ran to the closet, brought forth a telescope, and resting it upon the window-sill, applied her eye, and brought it to bear upon the queer stranger. Monsieur no sooner perceived himself the subject of her inspection, than he commenced making a most extravagant display of his admiration, by gesticulating violently—laying his hands upon his heart, clasping them before his face, bending one knee in an attitude of imploring adoration—and waiting her on the tips of his fingers numberless fervent kisses.

"The impudent fool!" exclaimed our little girl, astonished as well as amused at the man's conduct—"but I'll punish his impertinence, and give my uncle the slip at the same time."

Tearing the fly leaf from the book she had at first been engaged with, she scribbled upon it with her pencil, the following note.

"Oh! gentle Monsieur, I am locked up here by a cruel uncle. Fly to rescue me from this terrible imprisonment. There is a ladder in the yard, which you can easily elevate to the window. Set me free, and you will be entitled to the eternal gratitude of the unhappy PRISONER."

Folding the paper with her thimble inside, she threw it over into the hotel yard. The Frenchman darted forward, caught it, pressed it eagerly to his lips, and opened it.

By this time several of the inmates of the hotel, male and female, and all intimate acquaintances of Delilah's, the host himself being a relative of her father's—had crowded into the piazza, and were interested in watching the proceedings. The French man, as soon as he had perused the billet doux, cleared the fence at a bound, speedily elevated the ladder he found there to the window, and stood holding it firm for the gay little beauty's descent. She had no intention of exposing the prettiest foot and ankle in the village to Monsieur's ardent gaze, but after thanking him a thousand times for his gallantry, bade him return to the hotel, where she would soon join him to express her gratitude more fully.

"I have yet much honor to obey Mademoiselle!" Bowing humbly he marched off, turning at every other step to kiss his fingers to her, and now neglecting in his passage to wrench a board from the fence, thus removing every obstacle to Mademoiselle's escape. Delilah now descended and followed him.

"You see, Monsieur, it has not taken me long to join you," said she, when she reached the piazza.

"Oh, Ma'amselle, I shall have ver' large happiness if it will be no more to part."

"Ah, you are so modest!" answered Delilah.

The Frenchman bowed very low in acknowledgment; and Delilah's friends here united their voices in commendation of his gallantry, declaring that she could do no less in pure gratitude, than reward her deliverer with her hand.

Perceiving from their merry glances, that the company were ripe for fun, and considered the impudent stranger a fair butt, the giddy girl, exclaimed, addressing the landlord—

"Bring a broom, Cousin Jack, and let me prove my gratitude to Monsieur by jumping the broom stick with him."

"Jump the buoomstick with the Count de Laphinstank!" answered the good humored landlord with a wink; "no, no, my little cos, we'll manage it better. Here's a young friend of mine," pointing to a young traveller, a recent guest, who stood by, "can play parson for the notice and I'll furnish the feast gratis."

"But Monsieur has not signified his pleasure in the matter yet!" said Delilah, with an enquiring glance at the Count.

"Oh!" exclaimed the latter "I have so much pleasure I cannot express."

"Very good," said Cousin Jack, "just take your places now, and let the ceremony proceed."

The Count, begged a few moment's delay, for the purpose of providing himself with a white vest, which he declared indispensible. Leave being granted, he entered the house to make the proposed improvement in his toilet, and the young man who had been called upon to officiate followed him to procure, he said, a dictionary or a prayer book to read the service from. They returned together, in about ten minutes; the mock ceremony was performed, and the pair pronounced man and wife.

"Now, Madame," said the Count, with a slight assumption of lordly authority, "my coach is vait in de street—we shall make de journey to my palace in de country."

"Not so fast, Monsieur; I believe, in your country, married people very frequently do not live together, and as I am now a Frenchwoman, I shall adopt French customs."

"Pardonnez moi, Madame—vous de Frenchman come in de republique he do as de republicans."

"We will discuss that question at another time," said Delilah, "for the present, dear Monsieur, adieu!"

The Count remonstrated vehemently in bad English, and with ludicrously passionate gesticulations. Delilah laughed merrily, adjusted her bonnet, and went home, flattering herself that she had sufficiently punished his impudence, by making him the ridiculous hero of a practical joke.

It was about six o'clock the same evening that a servant tapped at the door of Delilah's chamber, and delivered a message from her father, requiring her presence in the library. Shaking off her drowsiness, for she had just been indulging in a short nap, she hurried down to the library, where she found her father and mother, Doctor Moore, and her Aunt Marcia, assembled in solemn conclave. There was something in the profound silence of the group, and the awful gravity that sat upon their features, which filled her with an unpleasant foreboding, as she timidly enquired her father's will.

"Your folly, Delilah, has at length involved you in a serious difficulty," said the old man, in a tone of mingled sorrow and reproof.

"You would not bind my mistress," asked Aunt Marcia, "you would not sell her, of course, sister?"

"I have been expecting it," cried in her turn, "I have all along been in continual dread that she would bring some such punishment upon herself!"

"Countess Delilah de Laphinstank!" broke forth the Doctor, with sarcastic bitterness, "a pretty laughing-stock, truly, you have made of yourself for the rest of your days. You have saved me the trouble of giving you a homœopathic dose in alopathic proportions—you have prepared yourself one that cannot fail to cure!"

"Why, what in the world can be the meaning of all this?" enquired Delilah, uncertain whether they were jesting in sober earnest, or had formed a little plot to terrify her.

"That foolish marriage ceremony," resumed her father.

"Was a very innocent joke," interrupted the daughter.

"I hope it may prove so," said the old man, shaking his head, gravely; "but at present it wears a very serious appearance."

"Ah, father!" exclaimed Delilah, throwing her arms around his neck, with a gay smile, "you are only trying to frighten me."

Her father hit his lip and knit his brow in the effort to keep up the slentorous which the earnest manoeuvrings of his pet were fast dissolving, and disengaging her arms, relented for to her uncle for an explanation.

"You have carried a joke too far this time, niece," said the Doctor, "the Frenchman turned the tables on you. Under the pretence of changing his vest, it seems, he slipped down to the clerk's office and procured a license; the young man, officiated was a regularly ordained minister, the ceremony, although you went through it with such solemnity, was in due form, and as you are of age the marriage is perfectly valid. Your husband has already instituted legal proceedings to compel your father to give you up, and the case is to have a private hearing before Squire Drayton to-morrow."

"Oh, uncle, you are jesting, surely," said Delilah, the tears springing to her eyes.

"You judge others by yourself, niece; but I have spoken the truth seriously."

It would be impossible to describe the violence of the girl's grief, when convinced of the reality of the doctor's statement. Her parents although they appeared to participate in her distress, made no effort to console her, not held out any hope of escaping from the doom she had so inconsiderately brought upon herself. Their seeming lack of sympathy shocked her more than the difficulty itself, for she refused to believe that even the law could force her to live with a man whom she was sure she could never regard with other feelings than dislike and contempt. She relied, too, upon the strength of Walter Lake's affection, and felt confident that his arm, if none other would be found ready and all-powerful to rescue her from so melancholy a fate. Anxiously, and with streaming eyes, she watched for his coming, but when the hours wore and he came not as usual, fears and doubts began to gather in a sickening throng about her heart. She retired to her chamber, at length, to weep away one portion of the night, and to pass the other in a slumber disturbed by dreadful visions.

The hour for the hearing of the case before the magistrate arrived the next morning and Delilah, in tears, accompanied by her father and uncle, entered the coach to drive to Squire Drayton's. The Count's counsel, with a few witnesses, were awaiting their arrival. There was one thing however, that struck Delilah as strange. That while the Frenchman's cause had been entrusted to the hands of a lawyer, she was compelled to appear in person, and her friends had neglected entirely to provide legal aid. She expressed her mind to her uncle, and insisted that Walter Lake should be immediately sent for.

"It will be useless, my dear," returned the doctor, "he has long been exasperated by your recent less trifling, and the affair of yesterday determined his resentment."

"An ashen pallor overspread the agitated girl's face; but it was quickly succeeded by a flush of indignation and mortification—"he is cold-hearted and false!"—she turned to the magistrate, and with assumed calmness signified that she was ready for the proceedings. The case was quickly despatched. The license was exhibited, the testimony examined, and the marriage incontestibly proven to be valid. The magistrate without hesitation decided that the person of the wife must be delivered to the lawful husband. He then addressed a few words of mild admonition to the defendant, and concluded by recommending resignation to her lot, and expressing a hope that the severe trial might result ultimately in her own happiness and good.

The provoking coolness and indifference toward her feelings which she thought was displayed in the whole proceedings, by even her nearest and dearest relatives, aroused to the full Delilah's pride, enabling her to conceal, for the time, her harrowing emotion. The Count's counsel now stated that a feeling of delicacy and regard for his lady's feelings had restrained his client from appearing in person, but that a coach was waiting to convey her under his charge, to her future home. He also expressed a desire that one of the lady's relatives should accompany her. The doctor volunteered. Delilah took a constrained leave of her father, walked with a firm step to the carriage, and entered it with the dignified courage of a martyr. But as the vehicle rolled off, and the feeling came over her that she was leaving her early home, kindred and friends, to share the fortunes of a stranger, whom she could not help regarding as a madman, and a brute, her affected composure forsook her, and drooping her head upon her uncle's shoulder, her agony broke forth in tears and sobs. The doctor strove to soothe her, by bringing to view the bright side of the picture. He dwelt upon the warm-hearted, frank and urbanity of the French character, the wealth and respectability of the Count; and expressed little doubt that she would soon become reconciled to her lot, and learn to love her eccentric lord. All his words were ineffectual, however, in mitigating her grief—she continued inconsolable.

The coach finally reached the place of destination, a beautiful country seat, some six or eight miles from the village, and Delilah, in a state of listless despair, suffered herself to be conducted into an elegantly furnished room, where her uncle placed her upon a sofa with her face buried in her hands, and left her, after an exhortation, to compose herself for the interview with her husband.

As she sat, reflecting upon her situation, she resolved to make an appeal to the generosity of the Count, to beg and entreat him to release her from her thoughtless vows, if that failed to affect resignation until the first chance of escape, and then go forth a wanderer, she knew not whither. In a few minutes the Frenchman entered. She did not look up, and he, seating himself by her side, said—

"Bon jour, madame!—I am ver much delight dat you come."

At the sound of his execrable voice, Delilah could scarce suppress the feelings of passionate resistance to which she was tempted, and the word "monster!" involuntarily broke from her lips.

"Ah, madame, you pronounce de word wrong; but I shall learn you to speak de French plus bien, toutefois. Mesanwe is de proper."

A pause ensued. Delilah averted her head, and the Count very coolly commenced divesting himself of his wig, whiskers, moustache and green spectacles. This done, he laid his hand upon her arm, and dropping his assumed voice and dialect, said

"Perhaps, Delilah, you may find me neither a Monsieur or a monster."

At the first tones of the altered voice, Delilah started from her seat, and ere he had finished the sentence, overpowered with joyous emotion, she had thrown herself, with a scream of delight, into the arms of her own loved Walter.

Hail on hour alternaida, when Doctor Moore entered, he found his niece cheerfully laughing over all she had suffered.

"How does the Countess Delilah de Laphinstank like homœopathic remedies in alopathic proportions now?" asked he, in a tone of affectionate raillery.

"It was a cruel jest, but perhaps I deserved it," replied the laughing bride; "at any rate, I am so happy in being so undeceived, that I cannot feel angry with the perpetrators."

Delilah became to Walter a cheerful, devoted and amiable wife, but from that day forth eschewed practical joking. She had, doubtless, by this time discovered that there are other and sufficient modes of amusing ourselves, and enjoying life, without sporting with the feelings or doing violence to the prejudices of our fellow beings.

Original Poem.

THE OLD YEAR.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.
BY T. HEMPSTEAD.

Green fields for bonny May,
Bright skies for summer fair,
And a shining wreath of smiles
For Winter's heary hair
A voice floats on the blast,
A wail goes up to Heaven;
As of a host with shield and helm,
And plume, to battle driven

A dirge is on the midnight,
As of a band that mourn,
A prince in his pride and high renown,
To his place at slumber borne.
A dirge for the Old Year gone,
A pall for his rigid bier;—
For the joys he bought and the smiles he wrought
One, one regretting tear!

The tattling earth was hated,
And a mourner forgot let down;
But his pale lip wore no smile of scorn,
His tow brow no frown;
The gray-haired sire drew nigh,
And gazed upon the form;
And he sadly thought, as he must be,
Far down from the blast and the storm.

And the manly youth was there,
Fair as the morning star,
But the young man turned from the spot away,
For he shook to gaze on the scene
The maiden carelessly looked,
As she stood, on that pallid brow;
And as cold I weep, as that pallid brow,
Is the maid's that gazed on it, now.

And a warrior came and gazed,
But he silently stole away
And he said I will die where the death-shafts fly,
And the blood-red banners play
But the warrior's cheek grew pale,
And his fiery heart grew still,
And they laid him down with his helm and plume
In the death-hale damp and chill.

Account! why thou we sorrow?
What gloom but hath its star,
To guide the wanderer o'er the waste,
To some safe port afar?
Where clearer fountains gush,
And milder breezes play?
Where friendlier stars light up the night,
And brighter suns the day.

A voice is on the midnight
Pouring a welcome strain,
From the sunny lands with their wreath of bloom,
That dot the Indian Main;
From Greenland's wastes of gloom,
And frowning Labrador
Where e'er the joyous sound hath flown—
From bleak or palmy shore

It hath shone—the lamp of Truth,
Our regions far or near,
From the tangled shades of the Caffre's house,
To Arctic desert drear.
It hath crossed the fiery main,
To the lands of black despair;
And Earth hath smiled where its ray hath been—
It hath left a glory there.

"This hail to the newborn Year!
He cometh in pride and power,
With his stormy train he hath come in state,
And his pennons that darkly lower;
A smile to meet his smile,
A firm front to his frown;
But a solemn sigh for the Old Year gone
That hath passed to his slumbers down.

A BRILLIANT SCENE.—The Rhinanthera Coccinea is the name of a flower, described by writers as a most beautiful one. It is to be found in the greatest profusion in the woods of Cochin China, where, if the accounts of travellers are correct, it makes the most splendid appearance. It is represented as not only rising to the tops of the highest trees, but as rising over them; and it so interlaces and festoons them, that the whole forest is hidden. When in flower the whole is one mass of crimson and gold of so intense color that the eye can hardly bear to look upon it—and the scent is as fragrant and refreshing as the colors are brilliant!" A tree so garnished with many of these vines must outvie in brilliancy and beauty the sober charms of a New England forest in October.

JANE SHORE.—Sir Thomas Moore states, that in the reign of Henry VIII., forty years after Jane Shore's punishment was inflicted, "her had frequently seen her gathering herbs in a field near the city, for her nightly repast. She was then extremely old, without one trace of her former beauty."

THE HAVANA SHARK.

BY HAWSER MARTINGALE.

The harbor of Havana, on the north side, of the island of Cuba, is undoubtedly one of the finest in the world. The entrance is narrow, hardly allowing more than two vessels to pass at the same time; but within, it becomes more spacious, and beyond that portion of the city, where are located the quay and the landing place, it expands into a beautiful bay of some two or three miles in diameter—constituting a noble and safe anchorage for vessels of the largest size. The harbor is defended by fortifications of great extent, constructed at an enormous expense, and at all times well garrisoned. The Moro Castle, the frowning battlements of which look down upon the vessels as they enter or leave the harbor, is a fortification of such great strength as to be regarded as impregnable from the sea. It is situated on a craggy limestone cliff, and effectually commands the passage. It is here that the lighthouse is situated, which can be seen at a considerable distance in the offing. The view, ever-changing, new and strange, which is presented to the eye of the stranger on entering the port, is deeply interesting, and well calculated to excite his admiration.

The waters abound with fish of various kinds, which may be seen in the night, as they spait, or seek their prey near the surface of the water, leaving behind them a sparkling and golden track; but the natives of that city are too indolent or unskillful to take them, and Havana is supplied with fresh fish by the industry of the Yankees, who bring them over in fishing smacks from the Tortugas Banks, or the Florida Reefs, and realize a handsome profit by their enterprise. We have heard that sharks are sometimes seen in the harbor, but although I have often visited that place, I never saw one. There is no apparent reason, however, why they should not delight to enter the harbor, and prowl about among the shipping, and pick up a stray piece of beef, or a tough old sailor, if they should happen to fall in their way. But to my story.

Some fifteen or twenty years ago,—we were never an adept at dates,—the ship Cassandra, of Salem, entered the harbor of Havana, dropped her anchor, and in a few hours was snugly moored, under the direction of "Old John," the assistant Harbor Master. The next morning, that important functionary, the cook—a remarkably dark-complexioned gentleman, by the way,—named Cuffy, approached the chief mate, in a state of great perturbation, his cheeks blue with astonishment, and his eyes as big as saucers. He held in one hand a piece of a rope, and with the other pointed to the end of it, which bore the mark of having been recently submitted to the action of a sharp knife.

"Massa Mate!" said Cuffy, in tremulous voice, "is there any sharks in Havana?"

"Sharks!" exclaimed that officer, whose name was Conroy, "I don't know, I suppose so, of course. What for you ask that for, Cuffy?"

"Why, Massa, look here a minute. Last night I took a good large piece of salt junk from the barness cask, tied this strong rope round em, with a timber hitch, well jammed, and threw em over the bows to freshen. Jus now I go get em and put em in the copper, and I no find em. Shark! I suppose bite off the rope, all same as cut it with a knife. See here, Massa!"

"Ah," said Mr. Conroy, after examining the rope, "this matter must be looked to. The fellow who bit off that rope had sharp teeth and long ones too. It is not pleasant to have such a voracious monster cruising around the ship seeking whom he may devour. He would make nothing of taking off a man's leg or an arm, if an opportunity offered. We must try to catch the rascal and teach him better manners."

In the course of the day, Mr. Conroy mustered the harpoon and caused it to be ground. He attached to it a few fathoms of rattling stuff, and placed it on the forecastle. At night he told Cuffy to get another piece of beef, and throw it over the bows to freshen, which was done by the grinning cook, who viewed with delight the preparations making for capturing the sea robber.

When the watch was set, at eight bells, Mr. Conroy charged the men to keep a good look out in their watch for the beef, and if they should see any large fish approaching, or swimming around the ship, during the night, to give him a call.

Now, everybody who has been in Havana, knows that the water in that harbor is remarkably luminous—and any object swimming in the water, even at the night is quite dark, may be seen at a considerable distance—as it moves along, a luminous phosphorescent wake is left behind, resembling the tail of a comet.

It was about four o'clock in the morning, when the man who had the watch, abruptly entered the male's state room, and informed Mr. Conroy that a large fish appeared to be slowly approaching the bows of the ship.

"Ah, ha!" said the mate, "that must be Mr. Shark, coming for his breakfast, without doubt. But I'll give him a meal which he will find it difficult to digest!" and he sprung from his berth, and in half a minute was looking over the bows in the direction indicated by the vigilant watch.

He saw a large fish, moving gently along on the very surface of the water, and gradually approaching the ship on the starboard bow, near the precise spot from which the piece of salt junk was suspended.

Mr. Conroy grasped the harpoon, as a well-tried knight in days of old would grasp his lance in a deadly encounter, and looking over the cat-head, he kept his eye fixed upon the sparkling and luminous body approaching. "A little nearer," he muttered to himself "a little nearer, Don Whiskerando, and then——" He is a noble fellow—nine feet in length, if he's an inch, and would take off a man's leg quicker and cleaner than a hospital surgeon. I'm sure of him now. One fathom nearer, and I'll drive the iron right through his back.

And this was was no empty vaunt—for Conroy was a stalwart fellow, with the limbs and muscles of a gladiator, and could throw the harpoon or grainne with unerring precision.

The uncautious object of his warfare had now approached within the desired distance, and his snout was within half a fathom of the beef, when Conroy, exclaiming in a voice of thunder "Now for it!" drove the harpoon, with fatal accuracy and tremendous force, into the living object beneath him.

"Haul in, Jack!" shouted he to the watch on deck, as the instrument left his hands. "For our lives fast!"

But what was his astonishment, what was his horror, to hear from the depth of the waters, as the harpoon sought its victim a shriek, a yell, loud and thrilling, as if giving utterance in a moment to an age of agony! The shriek ended abruptly in a guttural, stifling sound, as if it was the groan or and companion of death!

For a moment, Conroy was paralized with fear and wonder, but his presence of mind soon returned, and he quickly adopted a decided course of action. He drew forth his jack knife and severed the rope which was attached to the harpoon! He made the only witness to the singular transaction, an honest old tar, to be silent as a mummy. He then walked slowly all and went below.

On that day there was much conjecture about among the crews of the ships, in relation to the terrible shriek which was heard all over the harbor, and by many people on the shore; but nothing satisfactory was elicited. Some regarded it as proof that some horrible crime had been committed, while others supposed it was a supernatural visitation, ominious of some terrible disaster. The problem, however, was solved a few days after, when the body of a swarthy Spaniard, naked, was found floating on the water, with a death dealing harpoon sticking in his vitals!

The affair made a great noise in Havana at the time, and is doubtless well remembered by the old traders and residents. A reward was offered by Vives, the Governor General, for the apprehension of the murderer, or for any information which would tend to elucidate the horrid mystery. But as Mr. Conroy and Jack kept their own counsel, the authorities were unable to ascertain the facts of the case.

I.

OF HARRY HILLIARD.

Harry Hilliard was one of a thousand. He had a good report, not only of those that were without, but of those that were within his father's household. Of the former the poor declared him the best of friends; the old pronounced him the most considerate of young men; the rich submitted their plans and purchases to his judgment; the young sought his agreeable society and sparkling conversation. The serious admitted that such cheerfulness as Harry's was so far from being reprehensible that it was a model for those who would adorn their walk and conversation, and the gay quoted his example to show that a young man may be witty and accomplished, nay, a little erratic upon proper occasions, and still keep himself like the Chevalier Bayard, "sans peur, et sans reproche." Men admired his manly sense, women idolized his exquisite perception of the poetical and beautiful. Children pursued him as if he had been but a bundle of amusing confections—and here, by the way, is a chance for a very proper remark in parentheses, by one who is no chicken, and whose memory runs back through more than one generation of youngsters, who have risen to call his early play-mate pere and mere—

All folly, thine incomparable oil, Macassar!—

There is no balm in Columbia for grey hairs! But to our remark. It is merely to caution the ladies that though a man have all accomplishments, if he have no love and charity for children, he is a bad subject. Distrust him—unless you would have your own children (and lo!) the objects of his incessant torment. Well, Harry was wealthy, also. He was a dutiful son—and affectionate brother, and everybody said he would make an excellent husband. But. We will save what this but hinges upon for

New-Year's Poem.

THE DEATH OF THE OLD YEAR.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

Full knee-deep lies the winter snow,
And the winter winds are wearily sighing:
Toll ye the church bell sad and slow
And tread softly and speak low,
For the old year lies a-dying.
Old year, you must not die;
You came to us so readily,
You lived with us so steadily,
Old year, you shall not die.

He hath still: he doth not move:
He will not see the dawn of day,
He hath no other life above.
He gave me a friend, and a true true love,
And the New-year will take 'em away.
Old year, you must not go;
So long as you have been with us,
Such joy as you have seen with us,
Old year, you shall not go.

He hath had his bumpers to the brim;
A jollier year we shall not see
But though his eyes are waxing dim,
And though his face speak ill of him,
He was a friend to me.
Old year you shall not die;
We did so laugh and cry with you,
I've half a mind to die with you,
Old year, if you must die.

He was full of jake and jest,
But all his merry quips are o'er.
To see him die, across the waste,
His son and heir doth ride post-haste,
But he'll be dead before.
Every one for his own.
The night is stormy and cold, my friend,
And the New-year blithe and bold, my friend,
Comes up to take his own.

How hard he breathes! over the snow
I hear just now the crowing cock.
The shadows flicker to and fro:
The cricket chirps; the light burns low:
'Tis nearly twelve o'clock.
Shake hands, before you die.
Old year, we'll dearly rue for you:
What is it we can do for you?
Speak out before you die.

His face is growing sharp and thin.
Alack! our friend is gone.
Close up his eyes: tie up his chin:
Step from the corpse, and let him in
That standeth there alone,
And waiteth at the door.
There's a new foot on the floor, my friend,
And a new face at the door, my friend,
A new face at the door.

LOOK BEFORE YOU LEAP.

BY MISS C. M. SEDGWICK.

I was on a visit, not long since, to a friend of mine, who still in the unimpaired maturity of life, is surrounded by grown and growing children. Her summer residence is in the neighborhood of a thickly populated village, and being a "most gracious ladye," she is sometimes rather over visited by her social neighbors. We had one of those occurrences, which in June, give such an out door freshness and fragrance and always an indoor sweet security—a rainy day. Days of rural disruption, of rides, drives, walks and pic-nics had preceded it, and an immense batch of sewing had accumulated in my friend's work-basket. She called us all about her, and gave to each one an appropriate task. I took a pile of stockings, whose "windowed raggedness" was to me a storied record of our scrambles through the rocky beds of brooks and up the tangled mountain sides. On Clara devolved the task of "hook and eyeing," as she called it, and little Lilly was to replace the missing strings.

"You are good for nothing at the needle Anne," said her mother.

Least in mamma's kingdom of heaven," interposed Anne Reyburn, with an arch smile.

The mother returned a smile as she said, "You don't deserve for that, the pleasure I had allotted to you, but it does not signify—people seldom get their deserts in this world; so, Miss Anne, you may read to us while we work. There is Rowell's Johnson, on the table—a delightful book for social reading. Open it where you may, you cannot fail to fall on something agreeable."

We were soon arranged for our morning's business, and a livelier household group than the mother and her girls, I have seldom seen. That compendious and trite description of matrons, "fair, fat and forty," might be applied to my friend, but in her case the fortunate physical circumstances were symbols of moral wealth and beauty. That "fair and fat" indicated health produced by a wise simplicity of living, by the most beneficent disposition and the sweetest serenity of temper; and the "forty" was forty years of sunshine with only just so much of clouds as is necessary to keep trail human virtue alive and vigorous. Mrs. Reyburn, sat, graciously filling her commodious sewing-chair, with her huge work-basket on the table before her. Anne gracefully lounged on the sofa with her book, and the younger girls, their faces "bright with thoughtless smiles," sat on their low chair with their pretty work-boxes and sewing implements beside them. The door opened into the garden, fresh and flowery in its young June beauty; the rain pattered musically on the door-step, and the sweet briar, honeysuckle and mignonette sent in to us their exquisite odors. When the sky brightened for a moment the robins swelled their throats, but the clouds dropping down the distant mountain's side insured the continuance of the morning's rain, and we began our business with that placid contentment which comes of having no thought, project, temptation or desire beyond the present moment.

Anne Reyburn was just nineteen. Hardly any one saw her for the first time without exclaiming, "how like her mother!" and to a slight observation there was but little difference but that of age—in the daughter, the fervid and startling charm of the morning—in the mother, the more subdued beauty of the advancing day; but on a study, Anne revealed feelings of greater depth than her mother's, and a more impulsive gush, liable too to find their way in more uncertain and more devious channels—a character better fitted to modify circumstances than to be modified by them.

My friend influenced the formation of her children's characters rather by the atmosphere of affection and kindness with which she surrounded herself than by any direct bearing of authority upon them. This is an admirable and sufficient agent with gentle and pliable materials. Anne her one of those strong characters that must do for itself the hardest work of education, the training of feeling, the subduing of passion, the maturing of reason must for itself fight the battle of life.

I am tempted to draw Anne's character, which is curious enough in these days of task-work education and regular training, (dwarfing she calls it,) but her portrait, in all its unframed luxuriance, would fill more than the space we have now assigned to other matter, so we leave her to be guessed at by a few glimpses of her heart through her words.

She began to read to us, but she read rather dreamily. Her poetic eyes often wandered to the mist floating over the mountains, and finally running upon Dr Johnson's saying, that he believed marriages would be full as happy as they are if matches were made by the lord chancellor she threw down the volume saying "What a detestable old goose he is! What did he know about happy marriages?"

"Doctor Johnson an old goose!" said one of the little younger girls; "well, Anne, I wonder what discovery you will make next!"

"I dare say, Clara, you would like a husband of the chancellor's choosing, and would take him with a 'thank you, sir!' and 'if you like him, sir, I am sure I shall.' Now, heaven save me even from our dear chancellor, M——s, choosing a husband for me!"

"And yet, Anne," said her mother, "I am not sure that you would not in the end be happier with a husband of my wise man's selection than with one of your own choosing."

"I don't care about the 'end,' mamma. I wish to be happy in the beginning."

A light laugh, which Anne felt to be against her, ran round the circle. She waited till it was past, and then said, very earnestly, "You may all laugh, but as there was one of you in this room—dear to Lilly, that would not think it a disgrace to marry any man but him of your own heart's election?"

"Certainly not, Anne," replied her mother, "but you, my dear child, I presume, would have that election decided by love alone."

"Assuredly, for that alone influences the heart. Reason and judgment, which weigh heavily in the lord chancellor's balance, are not of a feather's weight in the heart's scale."

"But orderly worthiness as reason and judgment are in themselves, Anne," said Mrs. Reyburn, with a grave smile, "may they not be allowed to exercise an influence, or even to decide an insufficient love?"

"No, no—oh, no, mamma! An insufficient love is no love at all; is good for nothing. The man that I marry I must love with a love that doubts nothing, fears nothing, hopes all things and believes all things. The whole world's favor would not advance him one jot in my affection, nor its disfavor throw one shade over him."

"The whole world!" That is talking in very general terms; but suppose a case. If you had a lover whom you liked extremely but did not love, according to your extravagant notions of love"——

"Extravagant, mamma!"

"Do not interrupt me, Anne. Suppose that your father and I approved him; would choose him from all the world for you; that your brothers were his warm friends; that the children loved him"——

"You need not suppose anything more mamma. It would not all have the slightest influence on me—it could not. Love comes and goes whither it will. If reasons were as thick as blackberries they could not create love; and marriage is disgraceful without love—that

> "Most sacred five, that burneth mightily
> In living breasts."

"I grant you, Anne; but remember that same poetic oracle whom you have quoted, also says—

> "Wonder it is to see in diverse minds,
> How diversely love doth his pageants play
> And shows his power in variable kinds."

"Now I believe that an affection far short of—or rather far different from what you would call love—may make the basis of the happiest marriage. Do not you?" said my friend, appealing to me, and trusting that as her cotemporary I had arrived at her more sober point of view.

I confess my sympathies were with the daughter; but I compromised between the opposing parties so far as to say, that I deemed love without reason perilous, reason without love inadmissible, and the only sure basis, love sanctioned by reason.

Mrs. Reyburn admitted that in theory I was right, but she contended that there were many modifications and aspects of love, that characters were so various, and that life was so different in reality from what youth pictured it; that she had seen so many different loves that "hoped all things and believed all things" wrecked in the first year of marriage; that, for her part, she would rather her girls would trust to a more rational and calmer sentiment than that which made the inspiration of poetry and the basis of romance.

"I will tell you a true story, girls," she said; "a 'love-story, I call it. Perhaps it will rectify some of your opinions. My heroine was a friend of Miss ——'s as well as of mine. She knew as well as I, the parties and circumstances, as will vouch for their truth, though indeed there is nothing in them so incredible as to require a voucher.

"A Mr. Ewing, the friend of our parents, died immediately after some reverses in his business, and left his wife with a large young family, and an impaired fortune. Mrs. Ewing took a small house, and let her two best rooms to a single gentleman who boarded with her and paid her liberally—Mr. John Sheale. He was a singular man this Mr. John Sheale, but his singularities were graceful and pleasing. He was about thirty when he first took possession of his rooms. Dear Mrs. Ewing! she used to say he gave her no more trouble than a kitten and yet he had his particularities. Though his rooms were furnished with every convenience and elegance, he did not scruple to let in all the little Ewings—a perfect menagerie of wild young things they were—and they might wrap themselves in the bed-clothes, pull down the curtains, pile up the chairs, rattle down the shovel and tongs, any thing but touch his pictures and books, and the little sinners, like their unhappy progenitor, were very apt to seize on the forbidden things, and then they were driven forth from their paradise and the doors shut upon them. Sheale could try his best to look like a thunder-storm, but the sun always shone through the clouds, and the little wretches were weather-wise enough to know that no storm could gather there, and though Sheale had told them they never should enter his room again, and Mrs. Ewing with her sternest face, (poor Mrs. Ewing! it was so difficult for her as for her lodger to counterfeit wrath,) assured them Mr. Sheale was very angry "indeed," before twenty hours passed away they had one by one stolen in, and were as lawless and uproarious and as welcome as ever. Sheale had one peculiarity that puzzled Mrs. Ewing to the day of her death. Though of a spirit so social, that in every relation in life he left and made felt what has been happily called fellow-being (an) he had an aversion to being included in social arrangements. He prized above every thing else his individual independence, and when Mrs. Ewing would say 'Mr. Sheale, our friends so and so, are going to have a pic-nic on Staten Island, or are going to Long Island,' or wherever the party of pleasure might be, 'and I have promised you will join us—or 'we are going to have such a pleasant little party this evening, all your friends—do come home, he invariably replied 'no—don't count on me—it is not probable I can be there—or be here, and finally perhaps at the very moment they began to recover from their disappointment of his not being with them, he appeared among them, the very soul of all their pleasure.'

"Mamma," interrupted Clara Reyburn, "you said you were going to tell a love story!"

"So I am, my dear, and I am just introducing you to one of the parties."

"That Mr Sheale, mamma? Why you said he was thirty years old!"

"Yes, Clara, and he was thirty-five, before I come to the love part of my story.

"Oh horrid, mamma!"

Mrs. Reyburn proceeded:

"Mr. Sheale was not rich, but he had an easy fortune and few wants, and he continued to let it fall, like the quiet and plentiful dews of heaven, on the right and on the left. There was no burden in his favors. For five years he managed to make Mrs. Ewing live in a house next door, of which he said he had taken a lease for a bad debt, that he had long ago given up as hopeless. He kept a servant and secretly paid him double wages for doing Mrs. Ewing's work. He had always some poor friend in the shape of a French dancing or music-master that he wanted to give a little money to, and Mrs. Ewing would particularly oblige him if she would allow the children to take lessons of them, as he did not like to ask them to take money without an equivalent. This was something like reversing the old adage & killing two birds with one stone.

You will easily perceive that such a man, in the course of four or five years, would so involve himself with the concerns of a family, as to become indispensable to their happiness. In this five years Catharine or Kate Ewing, as we used to call her, had passed from the awkward age of her fourteenth to her nineteenth year.

"Oh, now the love story is coming, cried Clara Reyburn.

"And reason versus love, said Anne.

Her mother smiled and went on —

"Kate was a light-hearted, happy tempered young creature. She had been from the beginning a prime favorite of Sheale's; but for the last two or three years he had appeared rather more reserved toward her. While she was a child he was unlimited in his benefactions to her. Her room was filled with his gifts, books and pictures. All her books—the prettiest of nine-wood book-cases—all were his gifts. All her expensive masters had been employed by him. Now he ceased to be her open benefactor, some good earthly providence seemed still watching over her, and showering favors upon her. If a new book worth buying appeared, she was the first to possess it, and never had she occasion for a bouquet but a bouquet of the choicest flowers appeared at the door. Kate was not very fastidious in such matters. She did not see why if Mr. Sheale could and to give, he could not give openly as he had always done. Her simple hearted mother was easily eluded.

"I know very well, Mr. Sheale, she said, soon after these anonymous gifts began, where Kate's presents come from. I may thank the giver if she cannot.

"Mr. Sheale looked grave and displeased. A rare look for him for of all the men I ever knew he was the most cheerful, the most joyous, as he had a right to be, for he was the best. He said, 'I generally you mean your thanks for me, Mrs. Ewing. You are wasting them, whoever the giver of these trifles to Kate may be, he should be allowed the secrecy he chooses.

"Well, I assure you,' replied Mrs. Ewing, completely baffled. 'I have not the smallest notion who it is. I never once thought of any one but you. To be sure I ought to have remembered that you never in years past made any secret of your gifts.' A smile that in spite of him, played over Mr. Sheale's lips and a blush that deepened his rather deep colored cheek, would have told the truth to a more suspicious person than dear Mrs. Ewing. But she, as you know, Miss ——, always took the sense that met the ear."

"But, mamma," interrupted Anne Reyburn, "I trust Mr. Sheale was not a rosy bachelor. I can imagine a girl of Miss Ewing's age, falling desperately in love with a man, even if he were forty, if he were tall, with a pale, marble complexion, and fine large dark eyes and plenty of black hair."

"Oh Anne, my dear," replied her mother, laughing, "nothing can be more unlike your possible lover than my real one. Mr. Sheale was not above the middle stature; a little inclined to the round and the ruddy; and as to his hair, once, alas! of the softest, lightest brown, it had retreated so far from his forehead that he wore——"

"Oh, not a scratch, mamma; don't my he wore a scratch!"

"Not quite a scratch, Anne, but a small nicely fitted patch to hide the ravages of time. Plenty of black hair indeed! You will hardly find that on a man's head of thirty-five from Maine to Georgia."

"But a patch, mamma! Baldness is better than hat. My father's head now is beautiful; rather bald, to be sure, but the little hair that he has, is soft, bright, and curly."

"Oh, father's head is lovely!" cried Clara Reyburn!

"Oh, yes, I guess it is!" exclaimed in chorus half a dozen young voices.

Mrs. Reyburn and I exchanged smiles, she proceeded —

"Even the patch, Anne, did not conceal or deform the fine classic shape of his head, which with its moral and intellectual developments would have charmed a phrenologist. I am sure no large dark eye ever so expressed, as his beaming gray one did, the kindling and discharging of feeling. His lips between humor, kindness, tenderness and sympathy, were always in a sort of graceful movement, and in short, though he had none of your requisites of beauty, he was the most agreeable looking man I ever saw."

"Agreeable looking! Well, was Miss Kate Ewing agreeable looking too?"

Till now I had listened to what was to me an old story with as much interest as the young people, but now I interposed; and with enthusiasm, at the recollection of my charming cotemporary. I described her in terms that made all my young hearers exclaim:

"Oh, she must have been beautiful, and so interesting."

And Clara Reyburn said —

"I hope that 'old bachelor' didn't dare to fall in love with her!"

"Not, perhaps, what you would quite call falling in love," resumed her mother, "but the love he felt for her as a child, grew sensibly into a strange sentiment, and one bright day he was suddenly betrayed into a disclosure for which Kate was totally unprepared. She burst into tears, and frankly told him she had never thought of him as a lover, and never could; but that she loved him so dearly she would rather have died than told him so. A total change came over him—in place of his perpetual good humor and sunny cheerfulness, an immoveable gravity and occasional melancholy. Poor Mrs. Ewing could not divine what it meant. She first thought his affairs must be embarrassed, and then she fancied it was an incipient fever, and begged him to take advice. She told him all the house would be wretched, if any evil overtook him, and called his observation to Kate, who, she said, had not smiled for a week. He made no reply to her, but the next morning she was astonished by the information that he was going abroad, and that he and his servant were packing up his furniture to be removed to a place of storage.

"It was a wretched day at the Ewings. Poor Mrs. Ewing walked up and down her room, wringing her hands and wiping her eyes, and wondering (till Kate wished herself deaf that she might not hear) what could have happened to Mr. Sheale. Kate went to her worried work, but her eyes were so blinded with tears, that she could not see it; she took up a book, but she did not know whether she read backward or forward. She sat down to her piano and played so false, that even Mr. Sheale heard and noted it.

"Mrs. Ewing saw the carpenters bringing in empty boxes.

"'Dear me,' she said, 'it seems just as if a coffin was coming into the house.

"Oh, thought Kate, in the impatience of her first misery, 'I wish it were me, and that I were to be carried away dead in it!'

"Ma'am! said the chambermaid, rushing in, 'you never saw such an awful change as there is in Mr. Sheale's room, it's day changed into night—it's as solitary as the tomb.

"'Is he gone, Jane,' said Kate, starting up.

"'Oh no, Miss—Lord how pale you look—but dismal like a tomb, I mean. The wardrobe is emptied—the books are all in boxes—the pictures, every one of them, even that pretty likeness of Mr. Sheale that a body can never look at without feeling that he is just going to speak something pleasant—that is in a box, and it looked up at me somehow sorrowful, it did ma'am, and his dressing gown, that always hung there—always with the red cords and tassels hanging down by the bed-post, so lively and like Mr. Sheale, that is packed up too.

"Jane, do go away, said Kate, petulantly, 'you make my head ache.

"Why, Miss Kate!' said Jane, and as she shut the door after her, she murmured to herself, 'her heart ache more like, and its good enough for her, for I knew she was at the bottom of it.'

"A few moments after, in flounced Sally, the cook, and after turning her eye from Mrs Ewing to her daughter, 'It's true, ma'am, she said, 'I see it's true, I could not believe Jane. Well, how things does turn topsy-turvy in this world. I shall have to go too. I can't stand it. He never kept the dinner waiting, and never came too soon, and fretted for it. Who'll regulate the clock, now? I shall never take no more satisfaction in roasting a goose. He always said I did it to a turn.' The tears actually rolled over her round black cheeks. She continued. With most every body, the sun will rise sometimes, but he's as clear as spring water. He knows what is what, Mr. Sheale does. He says I'm the only one short of old England that can cook a Christian beef-steak, and he always has something funny to say. Oh, he's sugar and spice too!'

"A poor humble widow, who served the house from her thread and needle basket, opened the door gently at this moment, and asked

"'Is it true, ma'am? is Mr. Sheale going?

"'Yes'

"The Lord have mercy then on the poor.'

"Every new voice brought forth a fresh shower of tears from Mrs. Ewing. While matters were at this point, the door was opened a crack, and Mr. Sheale said in a broken voice, 'I am going out for an hour; when the carpenter calls, Mrs. Ewing, be kind enough to tell him the boxes are ready to nail up.'

"Half an hour after, when the carpenter did call Kate sprang up and said, 'I will speak to him, mamma.' An hour or two more passed away, when Mr. Sheale came in. He had a pass key to the street door, and as he opened it and shut it very gently, no one was apprized of his entrance.

"Of all the men I ever knew, he had the greatest repugnance to scenes. He dreaded dear Mrs. Ewing's ingenuous demonstrations, so he stole stealthily up the back stairs, and first entered his lodging room. The door communicating with his parlor was wide open, and through it he saw his books were replaced in his book case, he advanced a little farther, the pictures were re-hung in their places—a little farther still and he saw Kate Ewing standing on a chair before his picture which she had that moment replaced, and he heard her say,

"Dear, dear Mr. Sheale—never, never shall you leave this house if I can help it.'"

My friend paused. Smiles were on her lips and tears in her eyes. It could no longer be concealed that she was the heroine of her own story. I looked round upon her children. Surprise and discovery were flashing from Anne Reyburn's bright eyes.

The younger girls cried, 'Go on, go on, mamma,' and 'what did Mr. Sheale say?' and, 'what could Miss Kate say?'

"I do not remember, my dear children. It was one of those rich moments of life when much more is felt than said; but this I know very well, that from that time to this, I have never repented the repentance of that morning——

My friend was interrupted by the entrance of her husband. He had been into the village and brought home a basket of fruit and flowers which he threw among the children. His face had that expression of beaming, paternal happiness, which came from the consciousness that his footsteps once over his threshold, was the welcomest sound ever heard there.

I think there was a slight struggle in Anne Reyburn's bosom, as there will be when old ideas are giving place to new ones, but it was soon over. A joyous light flashed from her soul as her eye fell on her father, and kissing her mother, she said, in a subdued voice, "Nobody but yourself, mamma, would have made me believe that your was not a love-match in the beginning as it is in the end. Well, well, I have had many a dream of love; if I ever have such a reality as yours, I shall be quite content."

The light just dawned on Clara. "Why, Anne!" she exclaimed; "Goodness, mamma! Mr. Sheale, indeed! Dear, dear Mr. Sheale! If you had shaved him, mamma, I never would have forgiven you!"

A pretty family scene followed; a chorus of exclamations, a few tears, many questions, some jokes on the discarded patch, and a ringing of laughing voices——but here the curtain falls.

BONES IN THE DESERT.

BY ANNE C. LYNCH.

Where pilgrims seek the Prophet's tomb
Across the Arabian waste,
Upon the ever shifting sands,
A fearful path is traced.

Far up to the horizon's verge,
The traveller sees it rise,
A line of ghastly bones that bleach
Beneath those burning skies

Across it, tempest and simoon
The desert sands have strewed,
But still that line of spectral white
Forever is renewed.

For while along that burning track
The caravan moves on,
Still do the way-worn pilgrims fall,
Ere yet the shrine be won.

Then the tired camel lays him down
And shuts his gentle eyes,
And then the fiery rider droops,
Toward Mecca looks and dies.

They fall unheeded from the ranks:—
On on copes the endless train,
But there to mark the desert path
Their whitening bones remain.

As thus I read the mournful tale
Upon the traveller's page,
I thought how like the march of life
Is this sad pilgrimage.

For every heart has some fair dream,
Some object unattained,
And far off in the distance lies
What we would be gained.

But beauty, manhood, love and power
Go in their morning down,
And longing eyes and outstretched arms
Tell of the goal unwon.

The mighty caravan of life
Above their dust may sweep,
Nor shout, nor trampling feet shall break
The rest of those who sleep.

Oh fountains that I have not reached,
That gush far off e'en now,
When shall I quench my spirit's thirst
Where your sweet waters flow?

Oh Mecca of my life-long dreams,
Closed palaces that rise
In that far distance pierced by hope,
When will ye meet mine eyes?

The shadows lengthen toward the East
From the declining sun,
And the pilgrim, as ye still recede
Sighs for the journey done.

A Jorum of Fun.

THE ALABAMA VOTER.—"Are you in favor of Biennial Sessions of the Legislature?" asked a manager of an election in Alabama, of a voter.

"Who?" says the voter, whose name was Ance Veasy, and withal, tolerably green.

"Are you in favor of Biennial Sessions of the Legislature, sir?"

"Biennial Sessions! I don't know him—is he any kin to Rosh Sessions, sir? If he is, I'll be d—d if you ketch me a votin' for him! You never learn me tell 'bout that fite I had long with Rosh Sessions, up in Shelby—did you?"

"Never mind your fights now, Mr. Veasy; answer yes or nay."

"I don't know what you mean by your ya and na's, but I'll be dod rotted if I vote fur enny uv the Sessions family, no how you can fix it! Rosh Biennial Sessions, indeed!—jest as much fit for Guvnur as fire is fur a ice-house!"

EPITAPH ON ISAAC DAY.—A crier of one of our Pennsylvania Courts having lately died, whose name was DAY, one of the members of the bar, perpetrated the following laughable lines to his memory.

> "Step light!" the light of Day's expired!
> Silent is Day—who "silence" oft required;
> His staff is broken—the magic staff,
> That rais'd the heaver and suppressed the laugh;
> And Day's no more! no ray of light
> Bespeaks the Day—no morning light
> Will o'er restore the Court it's Day—
> Darkly they're left to feel their way,
> Since as 'tis told in Day's report,
> Day hath no more a Day in Court!
> Day now is Night, no more shall utter speech—
> Since Day's in darkness—far beyond the reach!—
> None cry for Day—who oft hath cried—
> To please the Court—when men were tried!
> And none that Day's shut out—we say,
> Peace to his manes! POOR ISAAC DAY.

A HAPPY REVENGE.—The great Dr. Radcliffe, of London, had a great objection to paying his bills. A pavior, after long and fruitless attempts to get his accounts settled, caught the Doctor just getting out of his carriage at his own door, and demanded the liquidation of his debt. "Why you rascal," said the Doctor, "do you pretend to be paid for such a piece of work? Why you have spoiled my pavement and then covered it over with earth to hide your bad work." "Doctor, said the pavior, "mine is not the only bad work that the earth hides." "You dog, you," said Radcliffe, "are you a wit? You must be poor—come in and you shall be paid."

THE LOVERS.

There was a candle maker man,
And he was very old.
For a was thirty years or more
Since he began to mould.

His business on his face was wrote,
As plain as though on paper:
His long nose, running to a point,
You sure would call a taper.

A daughter fair he had, but he
Was wont to beat and starve her;
Said she, "I'm sorry he's my pa,
But wish that he was farther."

And Cupid in her tender heart
An arrow dared to throw
As that silent sweet lady
He gave her, too, a beau.

But when her lover claimed her hand,
The father did dispute;
Said he, "Your suitor I would take,
But I reject your suit."

So when the shades of night were spread,
He round the house would hover;
And though he was no warrior, yet
Yet he was a mighty lover.

"My father's coming," cried the maid;
"Oh! lover, we betide you—
For he will cane you, I'm afraid;
But come with me, I'll hide you."

So in the boiler he was crammed,
His legs all cramped and bent;
Cried he, "I have the copper got,
Though he has not the vent."

And there he passed the sleepless hours
Of that eventful night:
The time it passed so heavily,
He wished that it was light.

At early dawn, to light his fire
The stone old fellow came;
Alas! for lovers' constancy—
He felt another flame.

Oh! maiden, maiden, could you new
Your lover's plight but see,
You pa, for lover's sake, you'd hate,
For pa behind he will be.

Oh! new wotkin that boiler lot,
His every limb seemed frying;
His situation, you'd say,
Indeed must have been trying.

Now from his seat he starts, and roared
The old man not a little;
Recover first yourself, old man,
Be cover then your kettle.

Ladies' Boudoir.

SHE LOVES HIM YET.

BY FRANCES S. OSGOOD

She loves him yet!
I know by the blush that rises
Beneath the curls
That shadow her soul-lit cheek;
She loves him yet!
Thro' all Love's sweet disguises
In tones girls,
A blush will be sure to speak.

But deeper signs
Than the radiant blush of beauty,
The maiden finds,
Whenever his name is heard.
Her young heart thrills,
Forgetting herself—her duty—
Her dark eye fills,
And her pulse with hope is stirr'd.

She loves him yet!
The flower the false one gave her
When last he came,
Is still with her wild tears wet.
She'll ne'er forget,
However his faith may waver,
Their England, same.
Believe it—she loves him yet!

His favorite songs
She still sing—she heals on other,
With all her wrongs
Her life on his love is set.
Oh, doubt no more!
She never can wed another;
Till life he o'er,
She loves—she will love him yet!

COMPASSION.—Compassion is an emotion of which we ought not to be ashamed. Graceful particularly in youth, is the tear of sympathy, and the heart melts at the tale of woe. We ought never to sport with pain and distress in any of our amusements, nor treat even the meanest insect with wanton cruelty.

Curious Scraps.

STEAMBOATS.

Boats with paddle wheels, turned by oxen inside of the vessel, were known to the ancient Egyptians. Wheel boats propelled by oxen, horses and men were known to the ancient Romans. Vulturius in the rare and very curious work "De re Militari," published 1472 gives a representation of two wheel boats—one with one pair of wheels and one with five pair. The wheels consist of four paddles each and are turned by cranks in the axles, and in the second boat the five cranks are connected by means of rope, so that their motion may be simultaneous. Such boats are alluded to by many other early writers as being useful in time of war for conveying troops from one place to another.

In 1787, Ramsey made a short voyage on the Potomac with a boat about fifty feet long, propelled by the reaction of a stream of water drawn in at the bow and forced out at the stern, by means of a pump worked by a steam engine. The boat moved at the rate of three or four miles an hour when loaded with three tons burthen. The weight of the engine was one third of a ton. The boiler held five gallons, and the entire machinery occupied but the space required for four barrels of flour, and also consumed from four to six bushels of coal per day.

The first boat in the world for any practical purpose, was the "North River," which commenced running on the North River, in 1807. It was built by Fulton, and was of eighteen horse power, and made the passage to Albany in thirty-five hours, or five miles an hour. The first steamboat on the Western waters was built in 1811. The steamboat Orleans of 400 tons, was built at Pittsburg in 1813, and the Vesuvius, 300 tons, in 1814. The first steamboat arrived at New Orleans from Louisville, was on the 10th of May, 1815, of the Enterprise. A steamboat, constructed by Fulton, commenced running to Providence from the city of New York, in 1815. In 1816, a steamship plied between New York and New Orleans via Charleston and Havana.

The steamship Savannah, sailed from Savannah in 1819 for Liverpool where she arrived after a passage of twenty-six days, being the first steamer that ever crossed the Atlantic.

The following notice appeared in Niles' Weekly Register, of the 19th of September, 1815. "A project is on foot at New York, to build a steamer of 350 tons, to serve as a packet between New York and Charleston, South Carolina, in which it is estimated the passage will be made in four days. Those whose opinions are entitled to the fullest confidence, decidedly believe that the voyage may be made with at least as much safety as in other vessels.

DERIVATIONS.—Pippin: this word is derived by Dr. Johnson from poppyapple (Dutch;) but it is surely more reasonable to suppose it, with other etymologists, from Pepin, the king of the country from whence the fruit is derived; as "filbert," from Philibert of France; whilst the "reinet" apple is la reinette or the "little queen;" as the gonilting is from Junction or Jonnette, in honor of some queen or lady of that name. The Bigarroon is so called from Bigarre the French province, where it grows; as the original word "cherry" is from Cerasus, in Asia Minor; while our "maydoke" cherry derives its name from Medoc in Burgundy. The brown pear is so named from its buttered or melting quality (beurre;) the "Colmar" pear is from Colmar, in Alsace; and the "Cuisse-madame" pear from its figure. The "sidon" plum is a corruption from Orleans; the "corinth" is the grape of Corinth; and the "damson" (property damascene) is the plum of Damascus. Menage considers melon as a large apple, and derives it from the Latin and Greek. If the esculent vegetables may be noticed, the "Jerusalem artichoke" is a curious instance of the corruption of language; it being the sun-flower artichoke, or girasole, (the plant turning to the sun;) Jerusalem being thus corrupted from girasole. Not less remarkable is John Dorey (the fish,) as a corruption from il janitore, or the doorkeeper; for the fish, being called on the Italian coast by the name of St. Peter, and he being supposed to be the doorkeeper of Heaven, and therefore called il janitore by our sailors, we thus derive the name of John Dorey.

THE FIXED STARS.

The extent of the earth's path or orbit around the sun is at least 160,000,000 of miles in diameter, yet the distance of a fixed star is not sensibly affected by it. The nearest and largest star to us is Sirius, or the Dog Star, which appears 27,000 times smaller than the Sun; and according to this calculation Sirius must be distant from the earth two billions and two hundred thousand millions of miles. A sound would not, therefore, pass from thence to us in 50,000 years; and a cannon ball whizzing through space at the rate of 480 miles per hour, would not reach the earth in 700,000 years.

The fixed stars are Suns, having worlds, planets and meteors, revolving around them, each one of which shines from its own lustre, having no aid from our Sun, which is too remote to yield them little, if any reflection. They were not created evidently by the Almighty to glimmer for the benefit of earth alone, but to shine resplendently for their nearest neighbors. All being spheres of fire like the Sun, they give heat, light and vegetation to inhabited planets or worlds, kept by gravitation within the spheres of their activity.

If there was but one inhabited earth in the universe, the moon would produce a sufficient brilliancy of light for it, after all others were taken away. And if our Sun, with all its planets, moons, comets and other concomitants, were annihilated, they would no more be missed by the e e of a casual observer in far-off starry land, than would to us a gra n of sand on the sea-shore.

A COLLECTION OF WORDS, WITH THEIR EXPLANATION.

Abandon, to give up; forsake.
Abase, to bring low.
Abash, to make ashamed.
Abate, to lessen; decrease.
Abbreviate, to shorten.
Abdicate, to give up right; resign.
Abet, to encourage; assist.
Abhor, to hate; loathe.
Abide, to dwell in a place.
Ability, power; capable of performing anything.
Abject, mean; worthless.
Abolish, to destroy; make void.

THE EARTH AND SUN.—The Earth is said to be 7,970 miles in diameter—making it, of course, 25,038 miles in circumference. Its mean distance from the Sun, or Sol, as it was styled by the ancients, is 95,173,000 miles. Its annual period around the sun, is once in one year; and its rotation on its own axis takes place in one year also. Its hourly motion in its orbit, is 68,243 miles—the hourly motion of its equator 1,042 miles, and the inclination of axis to orbit, 23 deg. 29 min.

LINES FOR THE PRESENT.

FROM THE EVENING MIRROR.

> A year hath past—a year hath severed
> Another cherished link from time,
> Another victim to life is weathered,
> And we are ploughing through our prime;
> Years are rolling as the billows,
> Every moment's flying fast,
> Days are crumbling as the pillars
> Of some mighty temple past!
>
> Each and all are but a solemn
> Temple built on open tomb!
> Every crumbling year's a column
> Fallen from the mighty whole.
> The Past is the departed hour
> Haunting round the ruined wall
> The Present is the dry flower,
> Growing wildly over all!
>
> Cherish fond the fallen pillar,
> And from it the lesson learn,
> Hearts are true that love the willow
> Weeping o'er the broken urn.
> The youthful year is but the growing
> Orphan of the parent dead
